Vladimir Putin gets a sex swing

Chapter One

Water. It gets you places, it keeps you clean, it keeps you ALIVE. And of course, it keeps me employed. As a sailor of a cargo ship by day and I suppose also a sailor of a cargo ship by night, water is probably the only constant in my life. After Judy left me and took the kids, I had nothing left. But then Bill, the crazy old git down by the docks, told me he would give me a job working on his rusty old haulier, and since then I've worked my way through the ranks, all the way from the pitiful barnacle-scrubber to the glorious ship-loader.

It was another day at work, but on this day I had to work on the docks. I fucking hate the docks (remember Bill???). Yeah. I had to talk to Bill about his "functional family". Also, something else you should know about me: I hate it when people talk about their kids. It's like...they aren't your WHOLE personality you know? Anyway, it was another day on the docks and I was on scanning duty. I gripped tightly onto the barcode scanner and made sure everything was exactly where it should be. I eyed Bill, and saw him chatting on the phone; I could vaguely make out him saying words such as "proud" and "what's for dinner?". God, I hate Bill. EVERYONE hated Bill. The more I thought about Bill, the more I realised how stupid he is. Bill's SO stupid.

"You missed a box there matey!"

What? Fuck. I looked down and he was right, there was a large rectangular white box directly in front of me, which was unusual because most boxes I saw were the cardboard box-brown colour. Upon closer inspection, it didn't have a barcode at all. I started to mention this to Bill, to justify me missing it. But of course, he didn't care. He was now looking away as if humiliating me was just another pastime of his, he was now smiling widely while talking to a customer. Classic Bill. At least I know it's an act. I sighed deeply and picked up the box to take it to the unlabeled section. But what I saw next was unforgettable. The address was written in a sharp red marker, and the first line said: Mr Vladimir Putin.

But if I am being truthful, it wasn't that unforgettable. You often saw celebrities' names on these parcels as a prank, a trick, a ruse. Vladimir Putin was certainly a popular option, but what surprised me most was that it was written in a red marker. It didn't mean anything bureaucratically, but it was highly unusual. I shrugged and chucked it into the pile of likely thrown away parcels. If I got a penny for every piece of faeces sent to a celebrity, I'd be earning more than minimum wage.

A week later, I was working another shift on the docks. This time it was with Stacy. Stacy was hired around the same time as me by that bastard Bill, and we had become quite close after numerous shifts spent together on the dinky docks. It was a Friday, which was famously known as Paperwork Day. I was filling out a form for a customer, I remember their name being "Margaret Thatcher", which was a funny coincidence because my aunty was also called Margaret Thatcher. I was about to tell Stacy about this anecdote when I started to hear vibrating. She looked up at me, somewhat startled and we made brief eye contact. We then both simultaneously turned our heads in the direction of the sound. It was the pile. The pile in which parcels are thrown into and forgotten about. I stared at it for what seemed like several hours. I turned back to Stacy to see her looking at me, nodding towards the pile.

"Go on, aren't you going to take a look then?"

I gulped. This situation reminded me of a point several years ago, just after Bill had hired me. He had practically forced me to watch his kids as they did a roly-poly on the floor of his office. I remember the feeling of utter resignation. There was nothing I could do at that moment. I remember the sick look on Bill's face as he looked towards me with some sort of "pride". I wouldn't have it. It couldn't happen again. I stood up and looked down at Stacy.

"No," I said. "That's your job."

My moment of valour had clearly not been perceived by her as she shrugged, bounced up and walked towards the pile. Picking up a stick, she began prodding and poking at random, trying to find the culprit of the buzzing. Realizing it was hopeless, she sighed and began picking out parcels at random, holding them to her ear, and throwing them into a new pile. As the self-proclaimed highest-ranked naval officer in the room, it was my privilege to stand back and watch my colleague work tirelessly at the task at hand. Eventually, she pulled out a large rectangular white package, looked at it and through her gum-chewing I heard her mumble, "Do you know a Vladimir Putin?"

At this point, I had forgotten about the original Putin Package I had received the week before. In fact, we had received 3 more Putin Packages in that window of time. One of them was definitely someone's shit. It was far too soft. Bill being the idiot that he is thought it was a teddy bear. Classic Bill.

Stacy placed the package on the floor as it was relatively large so it couldn't fit on the table. As she knelt down and began to rip apart the package I let out a scream of righteous anger.

"What?"

I put my hand in my back pocket and pulled out my trusty letter opener. This letter opener had been passed down in my family for generations. My father had had it before me, his father before him, and so on all the way back to Julius Caesar, of whom I was a direct descendant.

"Did you not read the official handbook issued to you? Article 15 part c CLEARLY states that the unauthorised meddling of packages is STRICTLY forbidden. Do I need to report you to the Minister of Defense"

"We would be meddling with it regardless, whether we rip it or whether we use your grandpa's rusty old knife."

I gasped.

"You remembered."

"What?"

"You remembered that it was my grandpa's knife. This is a big step forward in our professional relationship!"

She shrugged.

"That was a guess given, you know, how old it looks?"

Her pathetic attempt at an insult couldn't falter me. After Judy, I had learnt to suppress my emotions rather well, if I do say so myself. I walked up with the ancient pride in my hands and neatly cut through the top of the package in one swift motion.

I pulled the flaps of cardboard away from each other to reveal a dark grey plastic bag.

"Hey, look at this Stacy," I said. "A package within a package? Just like a Russian Doll! Get it? Because Vladimir Putin is Russian!"

I took a moment to chuckle at my farce. Even an old sea otter like myself could enjoy a good belly waggling from time to time. But alas, in my brief moment of vulnerability, Stacy shot forward like the snake she is, and picked the bag right out from under my nose! And before even I could stop her, she had savagely ripped open the bag and peaked her nosey nose inside.

"STACY! How dare you! I am your superior! I demand that you hand the bag over this instant!"

Removing her nose, she glanced over at me, and then put her hand to her chin, pretending to think.

"You know what?" she said, after a couple of seconds. "I don't think I will." And with that, she pulled off the last bit of plastic to reveal a vibrating mess of fabric and metal rods. Stacy's eyes started to gleam: "Oh my GOD!"

"What is it?" I asked. Never in my life had I seen such an intriguing contraption. I could not for the life of me think what it could possibly be for. Though judging by the way Stacy's shock was quickly turning into a gleeful grin, it couldn't be that bad, right?

"Sorry gramps", said Stacy. "This thing is NOT for your generation"

"What do you mean?"

"I never thought I'd see this in real life..."

Stacy pulled out one of the rods and printed on it in white calligraphy was

Frickathon 4000

"The Frickathon 4000? What's that? Was it made by famous American Industrialist Henry Clark Frick? He's a personal hero of mine!"

"You know they say never meet your heroes? Well, Frick was probably a racist."

"Well I don't know about that, but an anarchist by the name of Alexander Berkman attempted to assassinate him. Henry was shot twice in the neck and stabbed 4 times in the leg, but guess what? He was back at work within a week!"

Stacy rolled her eyes.

"Forget Henry, this is the world's greatest sex swing."

I felt my eyes widen.

"A swing? For SEX?? I don't think you know how sex works young lady!"

She whipped out her mobile phone from the back of her pocket and after a few moments, she showed me a photo. A photo I would never forget.

"This is how it looks fully assembled."

"But what about the sex part? That just looks like a giant swing."

I took a closer look at her phone to inspect the photo, and my eyes soon drew to what lay underneath. The price tag.

"£50,000 for a SWING?! A piece of fabric and some metal poles?"

"Well it's battery-powered...what do you expect?"

My memory soon flicked to page 25 of the official handbook. All goods estimated above £5000 must be reported and handed into the central headquarters.

Nothing could have prepared me for that moment. On the one hand, I was involved in the meddling of the parcel and on the other hand, I would be greatly reprimanded if my superiors found out that I hadn't turned in this extremely valuable package. I had to sit down as my brain raced with these colliding thoughts. Looking out of the window, I saw that the day was unusually windy. I saw a child chase after a balloon that had been swept up in the wind.

"We cannot hand in the parcel." I decided.

Stacy furrowed her eyebrows. "Why not?"

At this point, I saw that the balloon had descended again. The child reached desperately for it, but once again, it slipped through his fingers.

"We would get in grave trouble."

"Great! Can I keep it then?"

By some kind of miracle, the child had managed to jump up and grab the balloon again. I saw a smile grow from ear to ear.

I stood up.

"No. I changed my mind."

Stacy blew a bubble from her gum until it popped.

I looked outside and the balloon had popped almost at the same time. The child had learnt a valuable lesson:

"Attachment hurts." I declared at that moment.

Over my years of valuable experience, I had grasped the idea that all isn't black and white, in fact, it's a sea of grey. For example, should pineapple be put on pizza? Truly, this is a perplexion that has troubled the greatest minds humanity has to offer for generations and will continue to do so for many generations to come. But it was only at that moment that I truly absorbed the idea.

"We leave tomorrow."

"To where?" Stacy replied, spitting out her gum and sticking it under the nearby table.

"London. You, me, the Frickathon 4000. We're going on a road trip."

Stacy nodded whilst pulling out another strip of bubble gum. She offered me one, and I would have usually declined but since I was already breaking all of the rules today, I decided to invest fully in the bad boy life, and snatched the whole stick of gum from her, and shoved it in my mouth in one go. Like a professional bubble-blower, I swallowed that gum in one. It stuck to the sides a bit, but after pouring down a bit of water I managed to choke it down and pass it off as a 'cool' kind of cough; a chain-smokers cough. I let out a refreshed breath and passed the now empty bubble gum packaging back to Stacy.

It was a memorable moment because that was the first time I'd ever seen her seem genuinely startled. It was a stark contrast from her usual, constant apathy. Her expression relaxed again.

"Good one gramps". She patted me twice on the shoulder and walked away, out of the building. And so it was just me, and the Frickathon 4000. Feeling rather uncomfortable in its presence, I decided to call it a day and followed Stacy out of the building. We would have a long day tomorrow.
